A Grand Rabbit Hunt,

The rabbit hunters returned on the freight train last evening, bringing with them to this city 744 dead jacks. The whole number killed as nearly as could be estimated (of course it was impossible to give the exact figure) was 1,015. The way it came about was this: As soon as the party reached the hunting grounds C. E. Wallin and G. A. Black were chosen leaders to select the sides, and divided into two squads numbering fifteen each. Finally, Messrs. Harkness and Hill were chosen as the respective captaics and the slaughter commence ed. The line had not formed twenty seconds when a lively fusilade commenced and continued from the left to the extreme right wings of the shot gun army. Stray shots were very plentitul, and as a number of them found targets in the legs of one or the other of the hunters, the line became demoralized and skirmishing became the order of the day. The shooting was increasent, and the din continued until noon, when the boys repaired to the section house to brace up and count jacks. By this time two wagons were loaded and gas flaw freely during the unloading and counting of the innocent dead, Hill's party was ahead and maintained the lead until the finish. The result of the team eliot was: Hill's party, 446; Harness' party, 298, the account applying only to rabbits actually delivered in the wagons. An estimate was taken, and a careful count showed that the Harkocas party had killed 511, and the Hill party 504. These figures are given simply as a statement of fact, as the latter had an immerse lead. Such jokes and banter were never heard before and the flow of wit was immense. Very little whiskey was there and water predominated largely, but the bracing air and exhibarating pastime filled the boys to overflowing with good humor. The honors of the day were carried off by Mr. Medhurst, who led with the cham-pion score of 46, followed by Charles Read with 45. A number of the shooters ran up into thirties and forties, and while no account was taken, the writer presumes that in the whole slaughter one rabbit was killed to about every two shots. Two of the shooters were so upfortucate as to burst their guos, but in the case of Read it appeared to affect his score but little, as will be seen. Mr. Rawlins was the other unlucky loser of a good gun, caused by the end blowing off, - Salt Lake City Herald.

"GOING" FOR THE CRITICS .- During the earlies) years of Sara Bernhardt's fame a gentleman in the audience had one night the excaeding'y bad taste to hiss her. She marked him, found out his address, called at his house and had an interview with him. She teld him it was always her endeavor conscientiously to do her duty as a histrionic artist, and to please the public; that she regretted anything like failure in that duty, and that she should feel greatly obliged if he would point out her defects, in order that she might correct them. This spirited conduct won for her another passionate admirrer. Another day she read in a certain Parisian paper the statement that her bair was false and that her teeth were far too good to be genuine. Next day the dramatic critic was amozed to behold a lady dash icto his room and let down her hair in his presence. "Pull it I" she exclaimed as she placed a luxuriant tress in one of his hands. "Is this real hair or not?" "Certainly, certainly," stam-mered the man. Catching hold of his other hand she opened her mouth-but happily not to bite-and made him floger her teetb. these false?" shricked the lady. "Ne; they are the most beautiful real teeth I ever beheld in my life," declared the terrified victim, who would have willingly sworn that black was white if it would have given his visitor the least satisfaction. "I am Sata Bernhardt," pro-claimed the lady, with as much serenity as she could possibly put into her voice, and the wretched critic made up his mind for the worst. He, too, has a nie become one of her most de voted vassels, though, indeed, I do not know how any man would dare to be anything clae. If any such foolhardy wight exists in Paris he may be sure that, sooner or later, Sara will "go for him."
